

Facebook Follies

Human Beings by nature are social creatures one of our most basic and primitive needs is to connect with others. When the telegraph was invented in the 19th century it changed everything and all the innovations and communication that followed served the same purpose : to bring people closer together. We record our lives, we interact with others and without a care in the world we share our personal experiences online, you could say it's a modern version of the old primitive need.

Man « I tweet, I post, I blog, therefore I am »

But all of this sharing comes at a personal risk

Man « I remember believing in the early days that Darwin would have an affect, people would learn from their past mistakes and I am afraid it's not happening, people are basically still cavemen in front of their computers and keyboards they're neanderthals »

Cavemen or not, nothing in the world absolutely nothing is attracting as many users of social media as Facebook.

man « you aren't anyone on the internet if you re not on Facebook »

Simply put, social media is changing the way people interact, in many cases it's a bumpy ride. All that personal information being shared with people we've never even met with consequences down the road that are impossible to predict. How crazy is this really ?
